

Patient-specific simulation of the blood flow in the heart: model-driven analysis of ultrasound data and data-driven finite element models

Johan Hoffman, Computational Science and Technology, EECS, KTH

A clinical pathway for patient-specific simulation of the blood flow in the left ventricle of the heart is developed based on ultrasound data and computational models of the human heart. The specific focus is to model valve disease and to predict the outcome of clinical interventions.